graph in the book. Ouray and Chipeta were riding the mule. "One day Ouray and Chipeta were riding the mule and came to a swollen stream and found some emigrants preparing to cross over. Ouray and Chipeta told them they could not and took them to another ford where they crossed in safety. A few days after this occasion another emigrant wagon came and the family tried to cross the stream and all were lost. Ouray and Chipeta were not there to warn them of the danger." In the above paragraph to Chipeta from the book and asked if it were true and she said it was.¹

¹Besides the writers' knowing the Utes personally, the senior having been with them as a government official together with them since his retirement, a total of some forty-three years, they have references the agency files both at Ouray and Fort Duchesne, Utah War Department records, and the various references to these Indians in "Handbook of American Indians," Bull. 30, parts 1 and 2, Bureau of American Ethnology, Washington, October 12, 1912.

JOHN CROOK'S JOURNAL (Concluded)

We commenced cutting logs this year to build homestead city lots. (in Heber.) Last week in August we harvested wheat. Sept. 3rd began on the wheat. In 1861 we hauled 800 bushels of wheat, also some for Jonathen Clegg and some for C. N. Crook. We commenced plowing her cabin where she had a little table set against the wall. Over the table she spread a clean cloth, set the table, using her own dishes. Then she brought up some boxes for chairs for us to sit on and announced that our meal was ready for us. She stood by in readiness for anything more she could do for us, not permitting anyone else in camp to turn a hand, showing her gratitude
